Assange's Law' - Moving Towards Realization Julian Assange, who has been residing in the Ecuadorian embassy in London for more than one year now, is set to get his day in court as the British government is set to decide if it will proceed with extradition warrant for him. Meanwhile, WikiLeaks founder is making a new video documentary about his life in the embassy and why he fled Britain. In addition to that, the Foreign Ministry of Ecuador has confirmed that an investigation in relation to the WikiLeaks founder's alleged rape in Sweden will take place. The move is in line with the country's obligation under Ecuador's asylum agreement with the UK. President Rafael Correa informed the Ecuadorian people about the developments that are taking place in the ongoing debate on Julian Assange's case. In a televised statement, he said that he informed Assange and the Ecuadorian people about the investigation on Assange which was launched by the Swedish authorities. After Assange took refuge in the embassy in 2012, the British government made sure that it obtained an arrest warrant for him, which was eventually withdrawn in February 2016. "This judgment will allow the British government to present the charges against Assange in open court. The charge is about Wikileaks. Any trial is about freedom of information," Julian Assange's legal representative Mark Stephens told The Guardian. "We will see it is the appropriate avenue for the British government to go down, we have seen it before with Bradley Manning," he added. Assange is wanted in Sweden for questioning over alleged sex crimes committed more than a decade ago. Swedish prosecutors refused to extradite him for questioning in the country and withdrew their warrant in February. After Swedish authorities issued its decision, British courts were no longer able to consider the extradition as it is protected under the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR). Assange has repeatedly claimed that his extradition to Sweden will hinder his freedom of speech and the press. He has also said that he will appeal the court's decision in the UK Supreme Court. The WikiLeaks founder appeared on The Real News on Thursday with American journalist e79caf774b
