What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CS5?

Got a LG G5 on the way, but the G6 and G6 Plus are rapidly becoming my favorite Google-made Nexus. The G6 has some beautiful hardware, easily the best of the lot, but it's a fingerprint magnet. The Plus is even worse, being just as prone to be smudged as the regular G6. I'd like some advice as I'll likely be making a decision between the two. For those who haven't used Android for a while, you'd be forgiven for not knowing that the back button of recent Nexus phones is just a hardware button. There are also few other standard hardware functions like the volume buttons, power button, and a lock button, which sound like changes for the better. With the G6 and G6 Plus, the back button's function is changed to a Google search action. The G6 Plus has no hardware buttons at all, which sucks. Not that there's a whole lot of use for them. But it means a larger homescreen. Except the G6/Plus's back button is in a weird location, making the screen a bit too tall. Of the two, the G6 has a somewhat excellent battery life. The Plus is frequently taking 70%+ of my battery during normal usage. The G6/Plus's camera is probably the most similar to LG's regular G5/5x. Same 8MP with OIS, same professional mode with options like manual focus, HDR, high-speed shooting, and so on. The G6 Plus has three "lenses" on the back of the phone instead of a single lens, and they're more for the dual selfie cameras than anything else. Just for comparison, the G6 Plus doesn't beat the OnePlus 3 camera: LG G6 (left) LG G6 Plus (right) Of course, it doesn't need to. And I suspect that's the real purpose of the extra front camera, but it would be nice if the G6 had its own proper camera instead of a modified G6 Plus's. All the internals that matter have been upgraded. The G6/Plus have the same Adreno 615 GPU as the G5/5x, which is to say basically the same as the Nexus 5X and 6. I think they would have had a faster GPU if Google had gone with a 5X. But since the G6 Plus is a Plus, it probably
