The answer to this important question has been sought by comparing the gene sequence of the variable number of tandem repeats (VNTR) in the 3' untranslated region (3'UTR) of the long terminal repeat (LTR) of HIV-1, in different human ethnic groups. We report that the VNTR in the 3'UTR of the LTR of HIV-1 is in linkage disequilibrium with the A2 allele of a dinucleotide microsatellite in human chromosome 20, called D20S175. The results in previous studies have suggested that in most of the world human populations the VNTR alleles of the LTR of HIV-1 are at variable frequencies, the most frequent allele in most populations being a 19-repeat allele. Other studies have suggested that the LTR of HIV-1 is evolving under strong negative selection and that this evolution results in a decrease in both the number and the length of the VNTR in HIV-1. We have tested these hypotheses by estimating the selection on the VNTR and the kinetics of the evolution of the VNTR by measuring the distribution of its length in different human populations. First, the fact that the VNTR is subject to strong negative selection (probably acting at the single-stranded RNA level) indicates that the VNTR itself is not responsible for its variation. Second, the results show that the VNTR has been evolving by a process of negative frequency-dependent selection. This observation suggests that the frequency of the VNTR 19-repeat allele is not low enough in most of the world population to result in loss of the VNTR. In addition, the results show that the size distribution of the VNTR is decreasing as a function the world population to result in loss of the VNTR. In addition, the results show that the size distribution of the VNTR is decreasing as a function
